

(Cont)

After a while, along came his second son, and the old man cried out as he had done to the first, but the bold prince answered: "If I carry you across I might become as you are with shaking legs," and off he went.

While the encounter of the second prince with the disguised king had been going on, the third son came and overheard the conversation.

Being filled with pity, the prince helped the beggar over the river, and took him to a little house which was in the wood.

When the young prince arrived back at the palace, to his surprise, the king was waiting for him with the news that he had been chosen to succeed his father as king.

"Because of your kind deed, you have proven yourself the most worthy of my sons, therefore my kingdom shall be yours!"
